Dear Stan:

International Security will soon begin its seventh year of publication. The Center for Science and International Affairs remains committed to ensuring that the journal's voice is heard in the defense and foreign policy debate of the years to come.

At this time, my colleagues and I are assessing our editorial priorities, and evaluating International Security's strengths and weaknesses. We would greatly welcome your comments in this regard and would consider them most seriously. In addition, I hope that you'll take a few minutes to fill out the attached short questionnaire.

Should you, in the process, wish to offer any positive remarks on International Security's past and present performance, my editorial colleagues and I would like to be able to quote you in International Security's promotional efforts.

If time permits, I would be grateful if you could provide these comments in the coming fortnight. If you have any questions about the journal or its current policies in the meantime, don't hesitate to telephone me or Steven E. Miller, the journal's new Managing Editor (617-495-1411).

I look forward to hearing from you.

Sincerely,

Paul Doty

INTERNATIONAL SECURITY

Evaluation

1. Is International Security fulfilling an important role in the defense and foreign policy debate?

2. What areas of, or perspectives on, the foreign and defense policy debate should receive greater attention in future issues of International Security?

3. How has International Security served your professional needs? How might it serve them better?

4. Further comments:
